

All types of energy companies should protect consumers

Dear Member of the European Parliament,

Did you know that a short and subtle adjustment of your heating could be traded just like energy? You could save money and help make the energy system cleaner at the same time.

You'll soon vote on the new Electricity Directive. It could bring new types of energy companies, called independent aggregators, which could do this job for consumers.

When you vote on the new Electricity Directive, make sure aggregators start on the right foot with consumers. Just like existing suppliers, aggregators should be responsible for providing clear and fair offers, contracts and information on the service provided.

The Consumer Voice in Europe

www.beuc.eu

Member of the European Parliament,

Brussels/Strasbourg